ON THE COVER

There’s a new home for poetry in downtown Chicago, at the Poetry Foundation library at the corner of Dearborn and Superior. Open to the public since June, visitors to the library may browse a collection of over 30,000 volumes, experience audio and video recordings in private listening booths, and view exhibits of poetry-related materials. See article beginning on page 8.

The Illinois Library Association is the voice for Illinois libraries and the millions who depend on them. It provides leadership for the development, promotion, and improvement of library services in Illinois and for the library community in order to enhance learning and ensure access to information for all. It is the eighth oldest library association in the world and the third largest state association in the United States, with members in academic, public, school, government, and special libraries. Its 3,500 members are primarily librarians and library staff, but also trustees, publishers, and other supporters.

The Illinois Library Association has four full-time staff members. It is governed by a sixteen-member executive board, made up of elected officers. The association employs the services of Kolkmeier Consulting for legislative advocacy. ILA is a 501(c)(3) charitable and educational organization.

The Next Step for Illinois Library Systems: An Interview with Leslie Bednar and Michael Piper

Michael Piper, executive director of Reaching Across Illinois Library System (RAILS), and Leslie Bednar, executive director of Illinois Heartland Library System (IHLS), responded to the following questions drawn from system membership statewide. Both of the new systems are primarily supported by area and per capita grant funding from the Illinois State Library (ISL) and serve multitype member libraries in two separate geographic regions.

Q: With the formation of RAILS and IHLS, member libraries are curious as to the advantage of the new larger systems over the former, more local, systems?

Piper: The old saying “there’s power in numbers” is definitely true in this case. In the current fiscal environment, finding ways to increase the efficiency of service provision is key to maintaining those services going forward. Without the merger, we would have been unable to continue to provide key services that libraries and their constituents throughout Illinois have come to rely on: delivery, shared electronic catalogs, and the Talking Book Service. In time the merger will help us realize economies of scale in areas such as staffing, building costs and maintenance, and other day-to-day operations.

Bednar: Consistency. We now have the opportunity to ensure members will receive the same information and levels of system services. We operate as two locations within the same grant from the state library, and RAILS and IHLS have pledged to align our services as much as possible.

Q: What role did the previous systems play, what role do the new systems play, and how do the two differ?

Piper: Before the state financial crisis, systems were able to offer a broad array of programs and services. Now we must focus our efforts on providing three key priority services: delivery, shared electronic catalogs, and the Talking Book Service. These are the state library’s designated priorities for systems, and they reflect the top priorities of our members.

Bednar: The former regional library systems served a very important role in library development and consulting, continuing education, materials delivery, and also with supporting local library system automation programs (LLSAPs) at the grassroots level. The new systems will continue to support delivery and LLSAPs, but on a much larger level. My analogy: when systems began several decades ago members needed system support that modeled available technology and communication methods. We have evolved to fewer systems as communication and technology have evolved to serve much larger areas simultaneously.

Q: Will the systems support continuing education (CE)? What role will LLSAPs play?

Piper: We look forward to the day when systems are once again able to provide all of the services their members want and need, and CE is at the top of that list. LLSAPs will continue to provide CE related to their shared automation systems.

Bednar: Within LLSAPs, continuing education will continue to be a service we provide. We are looking at ways to provide continuing education outside of the LLSAPs that is not dependent upon area and per capita grant funding. WebJunction Illinois is an alternative to traditional CE provided by systems, and is a grant project with continuing support from the state library.

Q: RAILS and IHLS serve populations that are much more diverse than the previous systems did. Will systems be able to address issues unique to small rural libraries as well as large urban libraries? How will you keep everyone informed?

Piper: Library staff members have always been tremendous networkers and we are working on tools that will help foster these networking relationships on a larger scale (such as online forums). We are in the process of forming a RAILS Member Advisory Group and one of the top priorities for this group will be to provide us with advice on how best to communicate with both large and small libraries. We will also take advantage of technology to keep in touch with our widespread, diverse constituency.

Bednar: Communication is the key to service in our much larger service areas. Members need mechanisms for reaching out to each other and to system staff. This can happen through the IHLS advisory councils that will be established soon, continuation of grassroots member meetings, and a variety of communication vehicles.

Q: Will member libraries be able to use the new system structure to negotiate larger consortial purchases (for example, digital books, databases, etc.)?

Piper: Looking further into the future when more financial resources may be available, it will be possible to explore ways to provide this service, if not directly, then through partnering or contracting with an organization already negotiating consortial purchases.

Bednar: We will continue to support consortial purchases through the LLSAPs and are evaluating self-sustaining models for consortial purchases outside of the LLSAPs.

Q: Will the LLSAPs within the new systems continue to function with different Integrated Library Systems (ILS), such as SirsiDynix or Innovative?

Piper: For the immediate future, yes. We are using the current fiscal year as a year of planning and exploring possible service models for the future.

Bednar: Our LLSAP working group is currently evaluating vendor responses to an RFI for a shared ILS platform. Our goal is to have all LLSAPs merged into a single organization, sharing the same platform and bibliographic database. The first step is to determine if there is a vendor that can accommodate our combined size, and what changes might be necessary if we can only share the platform and not the database.

Q: How will the new systems facilitate discovery and access of materials between member libraries using different LLSAPs? Will systems provide delivery service between different LLSAPs? Is statewide service a possibility?

Piper: Systems have long worked together to provide delivery service to the entire state of Illinois, via the LLSAPs and a wide variety of individual library catalogs, and we will continue to do so and actively seek new ways to leverage these services in the future. As you know, a delivery study is currently under way that I hope will help shed light on these issues as well.

Bednar: We are excited about the possibility of a single LLSAP in IHLS utilizing the same platform and database for discovery. That will guide and shape our utilization of delivery methods, with an end goal of an improved patron experience all around. In the interim, we will continue delivery between the LLSAPs, and look at options to make that more seamless. I believe a statewide resource sharing service is a possibility, and our move to a single platform/database in IHLS is an important first step.

Q: Do you see systems as leaders, experts, and models? Will you be introducing libraries to new service models and technologies—or merely responding as necessary?

Piper: Systems have long been in the leadership role in Illinois, especially in the area of technology. Our CE and consulting services have been key tools in fostering this leadership role as well. Introducing member libraries to new service models and technologies to help them meet the demands of the future is a key role I hope we can continue to play, as funds permit.

Bednar: I see systems as leaders in providing services that matter most to patrons. As we spend this first year refining our current services, we will also consider different service models and share with our members as appropriate.
Q: In your own words, characterize the relationship between the library systems and the Illinois State Library (ISL).

Piper: The state library is not only our funder, they are also our partner. We intend to continue building on the strong relationship we have developed. We share the same goal — to elevate library service across the state.

Bednar: I see the relationship as being collaborative and supportive. The merger planning in FY11 would have been quite a challenge without their support and guidance. With that behind us, I look forward to strengthening and refining our services to members, while working in partnership with RAILS and ISL.

Q: With state funding so insecure, do the systems plan to seek other sources of funding besides the area and per capita grant?

Piper: This is an area we would like to explore further in the future.

Bednar: We need to explore other models of sustainability to ensure that the services our members depend on can survive.

Q: Finally, why should systems still exist? Could their services be provided more effectively at a statewide level or even by independent consortia? Could Illinois libraries possibly be better served by a repeal of the library systems act and the redistribution of the area and per capita grant monies received by systems directly to the libraries?

Piper: Throughout their illustrious forty-five-year history, systems have demonstrated a cost-effective and efficient service model that served our state well and stood as a national model. Today’s systems are much different than their predecessors, testifying to their ability to stand the test of time. To survive, systems must demonstrate that they are the preferred provider for cooperative services. That means we must continually seek new efficiencies and cost savings. Our proactive decision to consolidate operations is one example of that. We know the merger is only a start. With support from our partners, we have every intention to continually seek new ways to improve, so systems can remain a vital aspect of our state’s library services environment.

Bednar: With the creation of RAILS and IHLS, we are truly approaching a statewide model of system services. After all, we operate from the same grant. We are committed to working with our sister system, RAILS, to provide comparable levels of core services. We recognize that member libraries have choices to make regarding service providers, and appreciate the trust they have placed in us. Illinois’ library systems have evolved over the decades in part due to the leadership and abilities of our staff and services. With much fewer administrative units today, we are able to hone our core services and deliver an improved experience to our members. The return on investment validates the utilization of tax dollars in library systems.
When the Poetry Foundation Library opened its doors on June 25, 2011, it became the only library in the Midwest dedicated solely to poetry, and one of a small number of poetry libraries around the world. As the first librarian hired by the Poetry Foundation, my fantastic task was to create a new library out of a singular collection of resources to be housed in an architecturally distinctive space. Located at 61 West Superior Street and designed by the Chicago firm John Ronan Architects, the building was designed to be an artistic, cultural building in an urban environment.

The newly created library exists to serve both the needs of foundation staff and to fulfill the mission of promoting a vigorous presence for poetry in our culture. The foundation's board decided that the collection would be non-circulating; how to use this valuable resource to engage the larger community of Chicago was yet to be determined. And that's where I came in.

THE COLLECTION FINDS A HOME

The origins of the library's collection stem from Poetry magazine, founded in 1912 by Chicago's own Harriet Monroe. Titles were sent to the magazine by both publishers and poets with the hope that they might be granted review space in its pages or even a listing in its “Books Received” column. When Monroe died in 1936, the magazine's book collection, along with its archive, was given to the Special Collections department at the University of Chicago, where both are still held today. After this initial transfer, the magazine's collection of review copies began to grow again, along with an accumulation of purchased titles and augmented by the occasional gift of a valuable first edition by board members or friends of the magazine. But it was without a home of its own.

One of the first initiatives undertaken by the Poetry Foundation, which grew out of Poetry magazine and expanded in 2003 following the receipt of a major gift by philanthropist Ruth Lilly, was to create “A Home for Poetry.” The goal was construction of a building that would house both the magazine, which had been itinerant throughout its century of existence, as well as all other programs and foundation operations. One of the central features of the building's public space would be a library where the collection, in storage at the Newberry Library since 1987, would once again be within reach of staff and made available to the public for the first time.

GETTING READY FOR VISITORS

My first charge was to prepare the collection for use by the public. During its years in storage at the Newberry, it had never been cataloged or made ready for external users. This involved three phases, some of which are ongoing. The first phase assessed what was in the collection and determined what would be held in open stacks, what would be closed, and what would be culled. Exceptional works that would be difficult to replace were placed into closed stacks. Additionally, many works that were fragile or in need of repair were also pulled into closed stacks.

“The newly created library exists to serve both the needs of foundation staff and to fulfill the mission of promoting a vigorous presence for poetry in our culture.”
The second phase addressed the documentation that accompanied the collection. The majority of the roughly 25,000 titles contained some form of paper ephemera; most of this was standard issue publication information, but personal letters from authors and publishers were not uncommon. All of the ephemera needed to be removed and preserved in its original order, with notes made as to its origin when this was not immediately apparent.

Cataloging the collection, the third phase, included a key decision to shelve single author volumes of poetry by author last name, as opposed to using the Library of Congress or Dewey system. Commonly used in bookstores and the fiction section of most public libraries, alphabetical shelving provides both ease of access and an association of reading as a pleasurable pursuit, as opposed to something done as a chore or out of duty. Alphabetical shelving also eliminated the need to add spine labels to a collection in which many of the titles were physically remarkable. We retained Library of Congress for all of the biographical and critical works.

In addition to the collection that had been housed at the Newberry, the foundation also possessed a second, smaller collection of children’s poetry, donated by current and former Children’s Poet Laureates. While this material did not require the research and archival work called for by the main collection, it did warrant the creation of a shelving system based on reading level. I opted for a rather broad system with the titles grouped into three levels to encompass the earliest readers through elementary school.

MAKING VISITORS FEEL AT HOME

Since the library’s opening last June, and with the largest portion of collection preparation complete, my focus has turned to developing programs for the library. The library is still in its formative stages, and as we learn more about our patrons’ needs, new program ideas will surely arise. Since our collection is non-circulating, our programming needs to be a springboard to inspire patrons to engage with both the collection and with poetry in new ways.

Our first program, a library open house, was created to introduce the collection to the public. We highlighted some of its richness by asking local poets to read works that were meaningful to them, and created a scavenger hunt which gave patrons an opportunity to explore the collection in-depth. We also had a fortune teller giving tarot readings and prescribing poems to participants based on their selected cards. More than 800 people attended, building an audience base for announcements of future programs.

Every Wednesday, we open the space only to children under eighteen and their accompanying guardians. This allows us to transform the space into a more child-friendly one, and also to run programs whose noise might otherwise interfere with an adult patron’s enjoyment of the space. We hold a story time for very young children every week, during which the children do art projects that relate to the poems that have been read.
We also offer field trips, free of charge, for any school that wants to bring classes for a visit. We work with individual teachers to customize the experience to meet the needs of their students. As an example, we created “Politics of Poetry” for high school students. Students use newspaper headlines to write their own found poems. After they complete them, we discuss how creative expression differs from the journalistic news. Then we discuss theories of authenticity and creative license as it relates to popular contemporary poetic works.

Our special collections are highlighted through talks and exhibitions. Our first exhibition, Beautiful Outsiders, currently on view until January 11, 2012, features titles from the library’s holdings of Black Sparrow Press, Burning Deck, and Fulcrum Press. These three independent presses are known for their striking book design and wide-ranging publication history. Events planned for the exhibition include a talk about design by Poetry Senior Editor Don Share and a demonstration of the clamshell press by April Sheridan of Columbia College’s Center for Book and Paper Arts.

The library is open to the public Tuesday, Thursday, Friday, 11:00 AM to 4:00 PM; and to children and guardians only on Wednesday from 10:00 AM to 5:00 PM. For additional information on library programs, services, and events, visit http://www.poetryfoundation.org.

Interview with Michael Cunningham

Pulitzer Prize-winning author Michael Cunningham (The Hours, A Home at the End of the World, Flesh and Blood, By Nightfall) headlined the Illinois Authors’ Dinner at the ILA Annual Conference, and graciously granted the following interview to Lisa Guidarini, Algonquin Area Public Library District.

LG: How do you feel about the direction publishing is going — eBooks, self and indie publishers attempting to replace big publishers?

MC: I don't think that indies and others are trying to push out big publishers. I think they're widening the field. They're publishing writers the big publishers won't, because certain writers just don't sell enough copies. They're making more books available to more people. I'm all for it.

LG: Do you schedule in writing time? How do you balance writing and other parts of your life?

MC: I have a strict routine. In the mornings I go straight to my studio, which is a fifteen-minute walk from my apartment in New York. I need to segue straight from sleep and dreams into writing — it helps me maintain the illusion that this world I’m inventing is real. I work for at least three or four hours, or more, depending on how it’s going that day, but never more than six hours, by which time my brain has taken on the consistency of lukewarm tapioca. I work six days a week. I am not particularly glamorous, reckless, or erratic in my work habits, and sometimes I wish I were more interesting along those lines. But really, I can only work this way — steadily, regularly, daily.

LG: Were you a bookish child? Favorite books?

MC: I was not, in fact, an especially bookish child. I grew up in Los Angeles and was more a surfer dude than a reader. It wasn’t until high school, when I was forced to read Woolf’s Mrs. Dalloway, that I understood what writing could be — how language could be made to swoop and swirl and sing. That’s what really got me started, first as a reader and then, eventually, as a writer. I will say, however, that Winnie the Pooh and A Wrinkle in Time were huge to me when I was a little boy, before I turned seven or eight and began to pursue an adolescent life of crime. So you could probably say my most crucial influences were A. A. Milne and Virginia Woolf.

LG: Was your family bookish/did they encourage your writing?

MC: My family has always been encouraging about my writing, for which I bless them a thousandfold. They would in fact have been encouraging about anything I wanted to do, though of course, being parents, they worried that I was embarking on a life of obscure impoverishment. What parents wouldn’t worry about that?

We were not a particularly bookish family. We weren’t opposed to books, we owned books, but we weren’t one of those “Highly Literate” families, we didn't worship the written word. I suppose you could say that we felt about literature the way certain Presbyterians feel about divine glory. Yeah, right, sure, but what’s for dinner?

LG: Any writers a particular inspiration for you?

LG: Which writers do you respect? Favorite recent reads?

MC: I’d have to say I respect pretty much anybody who’s able to finish a novel. Most recently, I’ve been enamored of Julie Otsuka’s The Buddha in the Attic, and Denis Johnson’s Train Dreams.

LG: Where do you do your writing? Do you do much revision?

MC: I work in a studio, a tiny tenement apartment about six blocks from where I live. I revise constantly, obsessively, and sometimes beyond reason. It’s all I can do not to go into bookstores and make changes, in ink, by hand, to the books I’ve already published.

LG: Do you handwrite/use computer?

MC: I use a computer. I love my computer. Words on the computer screen feel to me like they occupy a halfway point between my consciousness and the page. They’re like projected dreams, real and yet not quite real, endlessly malleable.

LG: Are you working on your next novel? Anything you can tell us about it, if so?

MC: I am in fact well into a new novel, but am sorry to say I can’t tell you anything about it. I’ve found that talking about a work in progress robs it of its power, in my own mind. A novel in its early stages has to remain a secret, something with which I live alone, a deeply private affair. Blabbing about it seems to dilute my own slightly nutty adoration of it.
Introduction

Illinois libraries provide a high rate of return on investment to the taxpayers they serve. They link people to information, act as a focal point of the communities they represent, and level the playing field by making resources equally available to all members of their constituency. As Illinois residents have become more diverse, libraries have developed collections and services to meet the unique and varying needs of these distinct populations. The ILA Public Policy Committee (PPC) works with the Illinois State Library and the broader library community to maintain open communications with state officials.

The Illinois State Library provides guidance and grants to libraries. It negotiates contracts and serves as a resource for all libraries in the state.

Public and school libraries receive per capita grants from the state that provide critical services. For smaller, less affluent libraries, these grants can be the only funding for materials or technology. These grants are even more important during difficult economic times when other revenue sources have been eliminated.

One way libraries provide a healthy return on investment is by having skilled and knowledgeable librarians to answer questions, organize information, and guide customers through the maze of available data. In order to keep and attract highly skilled staff, libraries need to offer pay and benefits packages that compete with private industry.

Libraries are often the access point to the World Wide Web for many Illinois residents. Again, skilled staff is needed to provide basic training to the public in new and emerging forms of communication, and to maintain the equipment. The three — five-year replacement span for maintaining updated hardware, and the ever-increasing need for added bandwidth, imposes a significant cost upon libraries.

Throughout the year, PPC meets regularly to review all legislation with potentially beneficial or harmful consequences for the library community. Working with legislative counsel, the committee will pay attention to issues ranging from library funding to intellectual freedom to pension reform for public employees. Its work will be shared with members through ILA’s communication channels and all members are encouraged to be active participants in keeping libraries on the agenda in their local communities and in Springfield.

The Illinois Library Association is committed to serving as an advocate for libraries by developing legislative initiatives that: improve funding for libraries; protect intellectual freedom and patron confidentiality; expand access to information and library resources to all Illinois residents; and increase the effectiveness of Illinois libraries through cooperation, collaboration, and resource sharing.

Library Funding

The Illinois Library Association will work with a broad coalition of library advocates to improve funding for libraries. The association will:

1. Work to restore legislated funding levels such as the public and school library per capita grants, and explore alternative sources of library funding.
2. Support legislative proposals to mitigate the harmful effects of the tax cap limitation act.
3. Work with the legislature to increase the Secretary of State’s budget in order to increase the funding for the Illinois State Library.
4. Work with the legislature to ensure responsible pension systems.

Intellectual Freedom and Privacy

The Illinois Library Association is committed to protecting intellectual freedom and privacy while providing open access to information for all Illinois residents. The association will:

1. Continue to educate the public on the safe use of the Internet, including interactive Web applications, by children.
2. Continue to oppose legislation mandating the use of Internet filters in libraries.
3. Encourage governing boards of schools and libraries to develop an Acceptable Internet Use Policy with input from their community.
4. Continue to oppose legislation that erodes the privacy of library users.

Access to Library Services

The Illinois Library Association believes access to library services should be a right and the responsibility of every Illinois resident. The association will:

1. Oppose legislation that would erode public library service areas.
2. Work to extend tax-supported public library service to the 9 percent of Illinois residents currently unserved.
3. Work to ensure libraries are established in good faith with intentions to operate as a library.
4. Work to ensure that school library legislation is expanded to equip all school libraries with certified media personnel.

Increased Effectiveness of Illinois Libraries

The Illinois Library Association is committed to promoting legislation that will increase the effectiveness of Illinois libraries. The association will:

1. Work to develop library legislation that is comparable to legislation benefiting other entities of government.
2. Work to develop initiatives that improve the ability of Illinois libraries to provide library services to the citizens of Illinois.
3. Provide measured, thoughtful direction into legislation that could provide administrative cooperation, public service enhancement, and economies of scale to public libraries in the “new normal.”

The job market is more competitive than ever, and internships can give new Master of Library and Information Science (MLIS) graduates a leg up in their job searches.

“Internships allow students to give different LIS career pathways a test drive, gain practical hands-on experience, build relevant skills to add to their résumé, and engage in valuable professional networking opportunities,” said Jill Klees, San José State University career center liaison to the School of Library and Information Science.

The San José State University School of Library and Information Science (SLIS) invites members of the Illinois Library Association to take advantage of this mutual learning experience by becoming internship supervisors and sharing their knowledge with aspiring information professionals.

Internship supervisors collaborate with SLIS faculty to provide rich, structured field learning experiences for students in a variety of professional settings. As interns gain new knowledge, explore career options, and expand their professional connections, they also participate in a two-way exchange of knowledge with their site supervisors and other employees at their host institutions.

“Interns not only contribute their time and work to our library, but also give us an opportunity to stay up-to-date on what is being taught in graduate schools and receive fresh input about current practices,” said Alba Scott, internship supervisor and librarian, U.S. Bureau of Reclamation.

Graduate students enrolled in the ALA-accredited, fully-online MLIS program at San José State University can select from more than 225 internship opportunities each semester. SLIS students live across North America, including Illinois. Learn how you can host an intern: http://slisweb.sjsu.edu/interns

The School of Library and Information Science at San José State University offers a robust curriculum for aspiring information professionals including two fully-online master degrees and a doctoral program: Master of Library and Information Science (MLIS), Master of Archives and Records Administration (MARA), and the San José Gateway PhD Program.

I knew the call was coming. My work as the special projects coordinator for all nine Illinois multitype library systems ensured that I was privy to what was going on with the state financial crisis, so I wasn’t surprised. The afternoon that it happened, I thought about all of the thousands of people in this recession that didn’t see it coming, had no advance warning. Most of all, who didn’t have bosses that were as kind and caring as mine, doing everything humanly possible to ensure that we landed with only the softest of thuds rather than being forced unceremoniously off the steep cliff of unemployment. At my office at the Lewis and Clark Library System (LCLS), we all had a few weeks to wrap up projects, gather new leads and share them with each other, mourn, and, most importantly, celebrate our work and encourage those left behind for the difficult task of merger.

Still, a layoff stings, and those first few weeks were hard. Work provides one with a sense of both purpose and accomplishment — and as someone obsessed with schedules, time, and lists, it was difficult for me to find a way to organize each day. But once I got my bearings in this new world, it became a time for reinvention. I took time to revisit my teaching career, the career that drew me into librarianship in the first place. I taught basic writing skills to college freshmen and, in between lessons about comma splices and pronoun-antecedent agreement, I sneaked in lessons about searching and resource analysis. That year of teaching reconfirmed for me that librarians are needed more than ever to be the guides to information as my students, woefully unprepared, ambled their way through a virtual world they thought they knew.

Though I deeply enjoyed a return to teaching, I never stopped looking for library work. About a year after I was laid off, I found myself as the director of the Helen Matthes Library in Effingham. It’s an exciting time to start this new chapter of my career, as we are embarking on a building project and developing a new strategic plan.

I miss having the same type of support and encouragement of the system consultants that I hope I was able to provide to other librarians. I would love to turn to them as I encounter this new world of levies, fundraising, leaky toilets, etc. But the systems have weightier issues to sort out at the moment.

Though I mourn for the systems of old, I’m excited for the future and how they will reinvent themselves to remain the cornerstone of the strongest library state. When I started working at the Lincoln Trails Library System (LTL), I didn’t even know what a library system was. I soon found out that they were support and safety nets for small libraries (and medium and large ones, too), networks linking resources in both the real and virtual worlds, and incubators of innovation. They were (and still are) able to try new and daring things and push libraries to do the same. They also continue to show that we are always stronger when we work together. These are the things I try to bring to my own library work because of the knowledge I received at the beginning of my career, from some of the greatest leaders in libraries today.
